Once more they saw her, at St. Georges, Hanover Square, when the wedding took place. Rose had tried hard to be allowed to have Mavis for her bridesmaid; but Lady Prettenham pooh-poohed the idea at once, and Captain Barrington, who was not of such good family as his bride, and who, ill-natured people said, was willing to take a penniless girl for the sake of her title, looked upon Lady Prettenhams decision as unanswerable. It is questionable to mix up ranks in the schoolroom, she said; but it is unquestionable that it is folly to do it in grown-up society. And no good will be got by taking that girl out of her proper station. So Mavis and Miss Russell stood together in the front of the gallery, and looked down upon the tall girlish white-robed figure, with the fresh complexion and golden...
