Excerpt: . 180,000,000 per annum, and that the average new investment of British capital was $150,000,000 per annum in the period 1900-1905, rising to 100,000,000 per annum during 1906-11. This enormous increase in the exportation of British capital abroad has occurred, we are reminded, during the present Government's tenure of office, and its explanation is therefore to be found in political causes. It is undeniably true, declares this writer, that the investor of the present day manifests a greater willingness to trust his capital abroad than before. This is not merely due, however, to the larger returns which now await such investment. Confidence is a relative term, and in the present instance the greater confidence in foreign investment has been aided by a declining confidence in home investment. While we do not wish entirely to controvert Statisticus's opinion in this matter, we think...
